My goal is to win the Pro Champion. I'd like to continue competing in the fields of dancing and bodybuilding. I'd like to inspire women my age group. Hang on to that dream and reach for it. There have been a few obstacles along the way. The road to achieving one's goals isn't always easy. Be patient and kind with/to yourselves.

Three years ago I was introduced to bodybuilding. It was a slow start learning about the best exercises to gain quality muscle the fastest, the importance of dieting, and the dedication and time it takes to be successful in the sport. I was a very skinny kid growing up, and would get made fun of, so the idea of putting on size really stood out to me. After my first year of training, I began to see the potential I had to really make it in the sport, and others saw it as well. I put on 30 pounds of muscle while also getting much leaner and stronger. The next year was even better since I was able to apply more of what I had learned about training and dieting to my everyday routine that I had set for myself, and once again I put on 30 more pounds. I told myself,

"I don't want to just train to look and feel good anymore. I want to be the best in the world. I want to see just how good I can really be at this if I put everything I have into it."

My dream is to make it the the Olympia stage one day and compete against the best of the best. Each day is another step closer to that goal. I wake up early in the morning to make and measure out my meals for the day, and then I'll train in the gym for two to three hours. With my first competition in early 2022, I can just trust the process and stick to what I have learned over the past three years.

The main thing I have learned, that I feel like causes many to fail at this, is taking criticism the wrong way. Don't listen when anyone tells you that you'll never be great, you'll never win, or your physique isn't good enough. Take that criticism, and use it to go out and prove them wrong, know what you need to improve, and most importantly, prove your supporters right. There's a lot of bumps in the road and the sport of bodybuilding is easily one of the most difficult out there, but if this is the route that you want, you need to set your goal, focus on purely yourself, and never ever give up.

Started my fitness journey in 2010 as a way to relieve stress. Fell in love and started competing in 2011 in benchpress competitions. Competed 2011-2015 all 1st place in lightweight class. 7-0. Best on record lift of 360 and 163-164lbs bw. Personal best bench lift of 405 @ 164lbs bw. Personal best on deadlift is 505 @ 164lbs bw. Squat pb 415@ 164lbs bw. Currently pressing 410@ 170lbs bw. 2 car accidents set me back a little, but I'm stronger than ever now. Also won 1st and overall in a non-sanctioned physique competition. Early on, being a single parent was sort of a setback. Financially I couldn't pay the expenses for the shows, but I never stopped training. Still in phenomenal shape and want to show the world that setbacks only builds character and it's possible to stay fit. Sometimes patience is your best friend.

My goal is simply to push my body to the limits of its fitness. Explore unlimited progression. Nurture through training, and nourish through nutrition. I am a 20 year old, natural aspiring bodybuilding interested in bodybuilding, general fitness, sports, and sports nutrition. My further goals in fitness are to go into bodybuilding coaching In order to help others get into the shape to compete, or to compete myself. Training since I was 16, these past 4 years have been a large learning curve, learning the best training methods, rest, and nutrition to best suit my body. Although 4 years seems like a long time, this is only the beginning of my journey and I hope in future I can grow an audience socially and help others achieve their goals. To anyone wanting to get into fitness or bodybuilding I'd say do the adequate research and begin immediately, make use of whatever you have, and begin pushing your body with training and adequate nutrition with the sole goal of improvement - whether it be through increased fitness, a better looking physique, or a better diet to achieve a longer, happier, healthier and more sustained life.
